The Inaugural Address.
Most of President McKinley's inaugural address was a perfunctory and mild-mannered essay. The first of the few suggestions of importance is that Congress enact a law empowering the president to appoint a commission to "take under early consideration the revision of our coinage, banking and currency laws."

The appointment of such a commission would be on a par with that of the tariff commission several years ago, and be productive of no more good. The Money Power would dictate the recommendations of any commission President McKinley might appoint, and their opinion would be discredited by the people right in the beginning. In connection with the recommendation for a currency commission President McKinley says he will strive to secure international bimetalism by procuring the cooperation of other countries—an impossibility, as the one great creditor nation, England, will never agree to it voluntarily, and will only be forced into it by the United States taking the initiative independently.

The inaugural address contains the time-worn and familiar doctrine of high tariff which Mr. McKinley has uttered on all occasions, until he has perhaps convinced himself, if nobody else, that the people can be made prosperous by increasing the burdens of the taxes.

A startling feature of the address is the portion referring to the depressed condition of business affairs. Mr. McKinley acknowledges that "the business conditions are not the most promising," and adds (mark this) that "it takes time to restore the prosperity of former years." Contrast this with the campaign promises of last year, when every stump and journal and campaign manager of the Republican party was loud in the confident prediction that immediately upon McKinley's election there would be a grand business revival all along the line. Recall also, the business boom (on paper) that came and the column after column of machine-made business-revival dispatches that appeared in the Republican papers narrating the starting up of factories all over the land. When the depression became apparent then followed the statement that the promised revival had been postponed until McKinley was inaugurated, and the most promising of that event McKinley himself postpones the revival indefinitely. The duped have been still more duped.

Only one other feature of the address is worthy of note, and that is the statement that "reforms in the civil service must go on," and President McKinley refers to the fact that as a member of Congress he "voted for and spoke for the present law," and that he will "not let it go uncorrected." His efforts in that direction may be only an "attempt"—probably will be—but if he really does uphold the law, he will have the biggest kind of a party fight on hand and will, in a year or so, be cordially hated by his party as (Grover Cleveland was despised by his party after he betrayed it to the enemy).

The remainder of the address deals in glittering generalities, particularly the subject of a foreign policy. But really the inaugural address means nothing. Let's wait—then "we shall see what we shall see." In the meantime don't be deluded into the belief that there is going to be a return of substantial and lasting prosperity so long as the Money Power maintains the present money system which is the cause of the single gold standard which tends to do. Look only for a rift in the clouds that will lead to a prosperous future by the free and unlimited coinage of both gold and silver at the present legal ratio of 16 to 1 by the United States, without waiting for the consent of any other nation on earth.

An article signed "A Soldier Who Wants to See Justice," appears in yesterday's Republican, and refers to the turning down of Capt. John Body for Postmaster at Danville. Mention is made of the fact that Congressman Kerr in his speeches last fall was loud in his praise of the old soldiers and promised to help them whenever he could if he were elected. On the strength of that promise Capt. Body became an applicant for the Danville Postmaster position, and his turning down shows how little Mr. Kerr regards his campaign pledges. The article also refers to the fact that this is the way the old soldiers are generally treated by those who are after their votes. It does seem that many of the old soldiers who stick so close to the Republican party realize that for about the only use that party has for them is to get into office on their votes.

The great Democratic victories last week in Iowa and New York prove that the people have taken the sober second thought.

President McKinley has called a special session of Congress for March 15, to help him grind out the confidence and prosperity.

This Confidence Man now plies his occupation without hesitation.
